1. Combinations

In the table below, you can find all the combinations of four questions and four answers. There are 256 combinations in total. One more description has been added to the 256 combinations in case a previously experienced example has not been found for comparison.

An interpretation is provided for each combination that forms a part of the sentence to which the stakeholder's name is added to the sentence along with the feature precondition. Combined into one sentence, the sentence provides an indication to what extent the stakeholders' actions meet the expectations described in the precondition.

The combinations are interpreted by Anu Piirisild.

Variants of combinations and their wording are as follows:

2. Interpretation of combinations

2.1. How to read the answers of the combinations in the EbA method tool

The results can be read in different ways, according to which one feels more applicable:

1. Look at the triple column "To what extent the preconditions are met" (column M-O), where each part of the sentence is listed in a separate column: combination of answers + stakeholder + feature precondition. Such a sentence display is preferred for those who want to read the result as a whole sentence but, at the same time, keep each part of the sentence in a separate column.
2. Look at the 3-part sentence joined together. In the EbA method tool, the sentence is located after the triple column "To what extent the preconditions are met" with the name Summary (column P). This sentence display is intended for those who want to read the result as a complete sentence without separating the parts of the sentence. We recommend using this column when the results of the analysis are included in the project documentation, and there is a desire to indicate the input for the decisions of the action plan, i.e., what was the result of the EbA analysis. In the EbA tool, this sentence column can be hidden.
3. Look at the yes-partly-no-don't know answers to the four questions independently (column H-K), without the interpretation, and the included stakeholder group with the feature precondition, and give your own interpretation of the situation.

2.2. The principles of creating the phrases of combinations

When interpreting the combinations, it has been ensured that (i) the phrase contains the most essential aspects of the situation and the result gives meaningful information; (ii) syntax of the sentence would allow linking to it the stakeholder and feature precondition without changing the wording; (iii) the sentence can be used for different types of preconditions; (iv) repeated elements can be used in the sentence.

The answers are intended to cover different types of assumptions universally, e.g., knowledge, awareness, attitudes, skills, emotions, and availability of tools or activities. Therefore, the answers should be read with some abstraction.

The principles of interpretation and repeated elements used in the phrases are described below:

2.2.1. The same stakeholder? – interpretation

Yes In the case of the answer "Yes," the stakeholder is not mentioned in the phrase because the answer describing the situation indicates that the information applies to the entire stakeholder group.

Partly The answer "Partly" means that the example of the previous experience situation provided for comparison in the EbA method applies to some of the stakeholders' representatives. Therefore, we can draw conclusions about some stakeholder representatives only. The word "some" is used in this case in the sentence. However, an exception is made if the answer to the purposeful use is "No" or "Don't know". In such a case, the answer is generalized to the entire stakeholder group of the situation because even if the smaller number of the whole stakeholder group did not act according to the purpose (answer "No"), or the result of the action was not known (answer "Don't know"), we cannot assume that the action in the created product will be purposeful.

No If the answer is "No", the sentence indicates that "there is a different stakeholder" about whom we have information, which should direct the reader to look at the actions of another stakeholder group to learn from there. However, the sentence reminds us that we don't know about the actual stakeholder whether the prerequisite is met or not.

Don't know If the answer is "Don't know", the sentence indicates that "there is a stakeholder" about whom we have information, although this stakeholder cannot be defined at the moment. The answer should direct the reader to define the stakeholder more precisely, if necessary, to learn from the experience there. However, the sentence reminds us that we don't know about the actual stakeholder, whether the prerequisite is met or not.

2.2.2. The same context? – interpretation

Yes In the case of the answer "Yes", the context exactness is not mentioned in the sentence because the answer gives itself the indication that there are no differences in context.

Partly The answer "Partly" indicates that the information applies to a "slightly different context".

No If the answer is "No", the sentence uses the expression "in another context", which should direct the reader to look at these other contexts to take a good or a warning example from there.

Don't know If the answer is "Don't know", the sentence uses the expression "in an unknown context", which should direct the reader to learn more about this unknown context to take a good or a warning example from there.

2.2.3. Purposeful use? – interpretation

Yes In the case of the answer "Yes", the action outcome is not mentioned in the sentence if the stakeholder is the same (answer "Yes"), or partly the same (answer "Partly"). It is expressed this way because the answer gives itself the indication that the action outcome is purposeful. If the answer to the question "The same stakeholder?" is "No", or "Don't know", the action outcome is shown in the sentence as purposeful.

Partly The answer "Partly" is expressed in the sentence with the wording "to an extent", which means that the scope, quality, or activity of the action meets the expectations only partially.

No If the answer is "No", the sentence uses the expression "the action outcome is incorrect". If the answer is "no", the sentence also contains a reminder that based on the current information, we cannot assume that the actions will be purposeful while using the new product. This, in turn, means that the purposefulness of the stakeholder's actions must be either analyzed further or prepared for testing.

Don't know The answer "Don't know" is expressed in the sentence with the wording "the action outcome is unknown". If the action outcome is not known, the sentence also contains a reminder that based on the current information, we cannot assume that the actions will be purposeful while using the new product. This, in turn, means that the purposefulness of the stakeholder's actions must either be analyzed further or prepared for testing.

2.2.4. Satisfied with the solution? – interpretation

Yes In the case of the answer "Yes", satisfaction is not mentioned in the sentence because the answer describing the situation gives the indication that there is no problem with satisfaction.

Partly The answer "Partly" is expressed in the sentence with the wording "there is somewhat dissatisfaction with this precondition", which means that there are some problems with satisfaction.

No If the answer is "No", the sentence uses the expression "there is dissatisfaction with this precondition". Such information should direct the reader to find a different solution, with which the probability of satisfaction would be improved.

Don't know The answer "Don't know" is expressed in the sentence with the wording "satisfaction with this precondition is unknown". Such information should direct the reader to determine satisfaction either through further analysis or testing with users.
